TLC Clinics Reach into Depths of Swazis' Lives

The Luke Commission 2011 clinics are back in full swing – swinging back and forth from predictable maladies to ones just too difficult...

Lions Harry and Echo faced several hard cases at one mobile clinic deep in southern Swaziland at a school called Makhwekhweti. However, that's often when God's presence radiates beyond the physical.

In one long day 589 patients were treated and received medications, another 146 tested for HIV, and 125 were fitted with eyeglasses.

Swazis waiting for various treatments, counseling, vision testing, and medications wound around three school buildings.

It was a sight that a camera cannot capture but a mind holds dear. Sounds of excitement and hope filled the air. In the background the Jesus film resonated; it was shown four times that day.

Amid all this stood a 10-year-old boy with rickets. We met him last year. The lack of vitamin D in his diet caused severe deformity in his legs, as they bow out. Operating on him, Lion Echo noted, might cause even greater pain and trauma as he grows into manhood.

The Luke Commission team did build him one of the PET wheelchairs. "He really should not walk or stand as much as he does," Lion Echo said. "It's sad."

Up walked a young mother with her baby girl whose head was enlarged. Hydrocephalus (when the fluid around the brain doesn't circulate properly) is not uncommon but left untreated causes brain damage and often death.

The mother had been referred to a neurosurgeon in Mbabane but had not taken the 100-mile journey to the city.

"You must take this baby to see the doctor now, now, now," emphasized Echo, pointing to the referral slip. "Get transport any way you can, and do not wait another day."

An hour later a gogo brought her crying grandchild to Lion Echo. Checking the baby carefully, Lions Harry and Echo could not find anything outwardly wrong. The baby was shaking and rigid. "He's inconsolable," Lion Harry noted, a medical term suggesting a serious problem.

Grandma was the sole caregiver for the baby and five siblings, all recently orphaned. If she took the baby to the hospital, who would care for the other children?

A family member must stay with a sick child. Fortunately, the baby was watched throughout the day and showed improvement with Tylenol syrup and antibiotic. However, the complications of bush treatment were evident once again.
